Aboriginal graduates thrive at WA Health

As part of WA Health's growing Aboriginal network, the Aboriginal Graduate Program provides university graduates the opportunity to build their career potential and shape a new future. Here are just some of their stories:

"I was so grateful to have the opportunity to be a part of the WA Health graduate program. The program provided me with so many opportunities to build on what I learnt at uni in a very practical and supportive way.

Having the opportunity to work in different placements gave me a broad understanding of how the health system works and build on gaps in my knowledge.

Since completing the program, I have been able to secure permanent employment within Aboriginal health and continue to learn and build on my skillset. I highly recommend Aboriginal graduates to apply for a position."

"I was provided with guidance and support from my supervisor and mentor. This guidance and support encouraged me to explore new and exciting ways to deliver the Aboriginal youth health program I co-delivered. The opportunities I had been given by the supervisor were endless. She allowed me to trial different activities and practice my public speaking and facilitation skills to an audience.

It has been a great experience and I strongly encourage current graduates to seek jobs within WA Health."

"This role has been a fantastic entry point into the field of Forensic Science.

I have gained valuable practical experience within the laboratory and have the ongoing assistance of senior staff towards my professional development.

My work is my responsibility. I am expected to work unsupervised, but I am still able to rely on the support of my team as well as outside connections.

My hope is that with the ongoing support I receive I can progress towards a more senior role in a court reporting Scientist position."

While opening their career to future opportunities at WA Health, this program allows graduates an opportunity to bring about real change, not only for the Aboriginal community, but for the health and lives of all Western Australians.
