2024 Aboriginal Cadetship Program

Are you interested in gaining valuable paid work experience and the opportunity to apply your studies to a career in health?

WA Health is looking for dedicated Aboriginal university students from a range of academic disciplines to join our Aboriginal Cadetship Program.

Benefits of being a cadet

- Paid work experience while studying.
- Employment opportunities and future career pathways.
- Valuable workplace experience related to your field of study.
- Grow personal and professional support networks.

Who are we after?

- Motivated achievers who are interested in improving their job prospects and growing a future career in health.
- We are looking for students from a range of disciplines and degrees including but not limited to; business/commerce, finance, public health, health sciences, information technology, medicine, nursing and midwifery, human resources, law, psychology, health promotion, allied health, and many other fields.

Am I eligible for a cadetship?

To be considered for a cadetship you must be:

- able to commit to 52 cadet days over a 12-month period of employment, starting February or July of the calendar year
- enrolled in a full-time undergraduate course at a recognised university, and have completed at least one semester but with two or more semesters to complete (equivalent/min 3 units per semester)
- identify as Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander.
